

TEA SELECTION

The Chinese learned to process tea in a different way in the mid-13th century. Tea leaves were roasted and then crumbled rather than steamed. By the Yuan and Ming dynasties, unfermented tea leaves were first pan-fried, then rolled and dried. This stopped the oxidation process, which turned the leaves dark, and allowed the tea to remain green. In the 15th century, Oolong tea was developed whereby tea leaves were allowed to partially ferment before being pan-fried. Western taste, however, preferred the fully oxidized black tea, so the leaves were allowed to ferment further. Yellow tea was an accidental discovery during the production of green tea during the Ming dynasty, when apparently sloppy practices allowed the leaves to turn yellow, but yielded a different flavor as a result.

WHISKY & TEA

Tea and whisky have enjoyed a centuries-long relationship. Like fine wine, both tea and whisky are time-honored beverages that require years of skill and passion to produce. They have accumulated a vibrant history; tea has inspired Chinese culture for millennia and both enjoy a global reach today. In addition to their prominence, the two make a particularly good match because their flavors work in harmony.

WHISKY & TEA

Nikka Days

Smooth and creamy, roasted nuts, toffee apple, toasty malted cereal and vanilla fudge alongside a hint of barrel char, freshened up by juicy apple.
